HE WEARS AN ARTIFICIAL NOSE.
Boston correspondence of The Rochester Post

An interesting case has recently been successfully treated at the Harvard Dental School, in which an artificial nose was attached to a person with such natural and life-like effect as to be unnoticeable to a stranger facing the patient five feet away.

Last spring the patient, a man fifty years of age, while at work in his carpenter shop, was struck on the nose by a sliding board. A wound followed the

The nose by itself proved slow to heal. This was an accident which proved slow to heal. This was treated as a skin trouble, but the patient got relief and noticed that the nose was growing each week. He came to the Massachusetts General Hospital in the latter part of June. There the trouble was found to be cancerous, and that the only remedy was to cut all around it. This meant to take off the nose.

It was done. Not a vestige of the remains of the original nose was left. After the patient had recovered from the operation he was referred to the Harvard Dental School for an artificial nose. He came last fall. He was first taken into the operating room, placed in a reclining position, and an accurate impression was taken in plaster of his nose, or what should be the nose, being then put two hollow openings of tin plates. When the plaster had hardened it made the base or model upon which to construct the artificial nose. This part of the task called for considerable study and skill. A photograph was secured of the patient, taken previous to the operation, and with its aid a nose was carefully worked up in wax. When the nose was finished in wax a metal die was run and a counter-die made to fit into that. About the model the constructing material (rubber) was built. This was done as in the ordinary plate work, arranged in strips of soft rubber and vulcanized. After being vulcanized and hardened by baking, its edges were trimmed to an exact fit to the muscles of the face upon which they rested. The patient's wearing glasses suggested an excellent way of attaching the nose position. Across the bridge of the nose the corresponding part of the spectacle was riveted, a small hook securely behind the ear.

when these were nodded securely behind the head, despite any reasonable facial contortion such as laughing, sneezing or turning the head, the nose refused to be dislocated. A Boston artist was asked to give to the new appendage a tint that blended and harmonized with his complete physiognomy.
